Foreword

For years, television executives have been trying to answer these questions:

How many flashing lights does a game show need?

How low will a contestant stoop?

How could anyone not understand that question?

What's better to give away? Cash or prizes?

How many versions of Family Feud is too many?

Can the game show host eventually be replaced with a robot?

Have some of them already been replaced by robots?

...and, why is Mrs. Mary Anne P. Tussledorn, a housewife from Des Moines, Iowa so perfectly average, yet somehow unsatisfactory as a contestant? Could it be that she still has some shred of dignity left?

Is there any act that's so stupid or humiliating that the producers of game shows can't find a contestant somewhere who will do it anyway?

Together, we'll explore the answers to these and many other trivia questions in the pages that follow.

Let the madness begin!

About the Author

Ima Snidely grew up on a pig farm in a town so small, that even she doesn't remember its name.

At age 19, Ms. Snidely hitchhiked to Los Angeles. Naturally, she was hoping to become a star, but ended up a "grunt" in a back office and eventually was asked to leave not only the TV production biz, but also the entire state of California.

She also lived briefly in the San Quentin area.

She refuses to discuss any other details of her miserable existence, but continues to pump out attempts at humor (in paperback form) so that she can afford bacon once in a while.

The author has a more serious side than is exhibited here. Other books by this author, including a series on the sciences called "EasyTerms," are featured at:
